Drop. Drop. Drop. The sound of the leaky tap is the only sound I hear. The smog prevents me from seeing anything. I stumble blindly through the market square, pausing for a moment in the right direction. I can feel the ~~no~~ cold biting at my bare feet. If you looked at this you wouldn't be able to tell that there had once been so much. Through the smog, I can just make out three people: a man, a woman and a child. It doesn't take a genius to work out that they are a family. At one time, when I was part of that. A family. But now that is a mere dream whiskered away by ~~ghosts~~ ~~ghosts~~
I wish never to leave me again. The clock strikes six.
The clock strikes six. I run towards the train - if I miss this, my chance is gone.

My car has a special horn.
So you can go make good. It has a horn so it's saying "I'm warning you."
Then it can change colors to Blue, pink, orange, green and purple. It can also go really fast. There's a really big horn for the car.
For long horns.

I can understand why she steals, because she doesn't have much and she needs food and drink to live. I think her parents abandoned her. Although I think that she doesn't have the right to steal because it says that people are as poor as her. So if she steals from them they might die. I think she should owe people to share.

The boy who had a quarrel looked very angry.
Michael's phone, which had a huge crack on the screen, broke.
The town, that only had a few buildings, was not very big.
Robert, whose whose hair was a snowy black, was twelve.
That rainy day, which shook the trees wildly, was awful.
My old teddy bear, that had lost most of its stuffing, is in the wash.
